Learn Something New, Stretch your Brain

1. When I was a new graduate from college, with a firm hand on a diploma stating I had a Masters degree in Finance, I was convinced I was now ready to conquer the world. Surely I would have my choice of positions, and could pave my way to wealth, simply by holding that degree. I was exhausted studying and reading those boring books forever. Never again would I spend night after night pouring over a book that didn't have the word "romance" in the title.
2. So happily I moved down the path of life, and took a banking position. Followed by an accounting position. Followed by an auditing position. And then I began taking a serious look at my life. Was this really what school had taught me? Wasn't there more to life than simply holding a job ? How was I supposed to find my true vocation?
3. I began sitting at my desk contemplating my future. Surely there were others out there like me who began to question their fate and decided that their lives simply weren't working for them anymore, and that a big change was necessary. Or was I alone in this quest?
4. The funny thing about a quest is once you set your mind to something, it's easy to find your answers. And the easiest way to find the answers is in writing. Books and magazines became my best friends. I began to read anything and everything, from self-help to business help. I began to get a new type of education. An education from listening to what others had to say about success, life, and the general pursuit of happiness. And I discovered the importance of a great education, not just an institutionalized education.
5. A great education begins with a desire to learn. As long as that desire exists inside of you, you can literally conquer anything. Education is one of my favourite topics. Knowledge is the key to success. It can unlock any door you choose. Simply by wanting to learn, and following through with the act of learning, you can become anything you dream of and education is so easily achieved! Literally anyone can receive intense, specialized knowledge if they so desire. Education is not synonymous with formal training. Education is simply the desire to learn. And there are so many ways to learn!
6. Thomas Edison had only three months of formal education during his entire lifetime. Henry Ford had less than a sixth grade education. Bill Gates never completed college. Yet every single one of these people became very successful in their lifetime. Why? Because they had a thirst for knowledge, and learned what was important to them in any way they can. They read. They educated themselves with happenings in the world around them. And they never gave up on the formal education of life.
